1. Introduction

The Jews' Free School opened as a Talmud Torah (A junior school for Jewish children in which they are taught Hebrew, Bible study, and the other elements of Judaism. Also denotes the study of Jewish law), at the Great Synagogue, London, England in 1732. Originally a charity school for fifteen poor orphan boys it grew to become the largest Jewish School in Britain. At the end of the nineteenth century the school roll peaked at 4,250; between 1880 and 1890 one third of all Anglo-Jewish children were educated there, plus the majority of our youngest immigrant ancestors and many of their descendants from the mid nineteenth century up to the early 1960s, combining over a hundred years of attendance at the JFS. The school is now called the J.F.S. Comprehensive.

2. A complete history

The Jews' Free School (JFS) traces its origins to 1732, when affluent members of the Ashkenazi Great Synagogue congregation established a Talmud Torah for orphan boys. The JFS itself was founded in 1817. During its time it has witnessed, and reflected, far-reaching changes in education as well as in the pattern of Jewish settlement.

Until the 19th century, there was no direct state involvement in education in England, and schooling for children whose parents were unable to afford either school fees or private tuition was, at best, haphazard. By the end of the century, in spite of the challenge of rapid population growth, free school education had become available to all, at least at elementary level.

JFS mirrored this expansion. At the beginning of the 19th century, only a couple of dozen East End boys could be accommodated in the school's Talmud Torah predecessor. By the end of the 19th century the JFS had over 4,000 pupils on roll, both boys and girls. In the century since, the school has migrated across London, England just as the descendants of immigrants have themselves migrated.

Although many children had no access to formal education before the reforms of the 1870s, religious tradition required that young Jewish boys receive some basic instruction in Hebrew, along with some rote learning of the Bible. This normally took place at a cheder - a private establishment, usually in the teacher's own home. The conditions here could be grim, and the instruction often fierce.

From early in the 19th century, however, social reformers had been coming to recognise the importance of offering elementary schooling to the masses. This, the reformers argued, would take children off the streets, give them a sense of morality, and give them the chance of a stable occupation when they grew up - urgent needs in the crime-ridden cities.

It would take until the 1870s for the reformers' aims to be realised in free elementary education for all, paid from taxes. In the earlier part of the century, it was up to the churches to take the lead in expanding provision in their own schools.

When there was no alternative, Jewish children attended these church schools, though all of them promoted a Christian curriculum to a greater or lesser degree. Those run by the British and Foreign Schools Society (a Nonconformist organisation) were relatively accommodating towards families with a different religious conscience. Others, however, such as those run by the London Missionary Society and the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, expressly aimed to convert their pupils to Christianity.

The Chief Rabbi, Solomon Hirschell, became so concerned about their activities that, in 1807, he proclaimed that any parents sending their child to a missionary school would forfeit the right to be regarded as Jewish. This was the troubled background against which the JFS was founded in 1817.

The school opened its doors in Ebenezer Square, Spitalfields, London, England in 1817 and was supported from the start by generous support from wealthy and influential donors, among them Rothschilds, Goldsmids, Montefiores and Mocattas. Indeed a close connection between the Rothschild family and the school continued for well over 100 years.

The JFS made an important contribution to education in the East End of London, England from the outset. Even in its early years, it had 1,000 or more pupils on roll. In spite of a dire shortage of suitable teachers, it managed to accommodate large pupil numbers by adopting the monitor system, under guidance from the British and Foreign Society's school in Borough Road, which served as a source of training and advice for many years.

When it first opened, JFS took only boys, but it started admitting girls too (to a separate department) when it moved to larger premises in nearby Bell Lane five years later. Throughout the 19th century, the girls were mostly trained in domestic duties, like needlework, knitting, cooking and laundry. It was hard, though, to get girls to attend regularly, since they were often required to stay at home for domestic duties.

The school made a promising start under its first headmaster, the young and very competent Henry Naphtali Solomon. Other masters came and went with rather less distinction, until the appointment in 1842 of Moses Angel. Angel (1819-98) has been described as 'the single most significant figure in Anglo-Jewish religious and secular education in the 19th century'.

He was a stern disciplinarian who 'moved around the School constantly. Despite his enormous administrative burden, he still found time to teach several classes each week.' And he taught not only reading, writing and grammar, but geography, history, arithmetic, algebra, and chemistry as well.

Angel kept a meticulous record of daily events in the school logbooks - those dating from 1863 till his death in 1898 survive.

Angel's long career with JFS saw the school grow and evolve through some momentous changes. The introduction in the 1870s of a national system of Board Schools funded by local taxes - the forerunners of today's county schools - looked at first as though it might threaten the existence of voluntary schools like JFS, which relied heavily on donations. But the voluntary schools survived, and JFS went from strength to strength.

Indeed, the school was needed more than ever when, in the 1880s and 1890s, the mass immigration of Jews from Eastern Europe placed huge pressures on housing and welfare provision in the East End. Not all the immigrant children could be accommodated at JFS, expand though it might. But it is estimated that JFS took in a third of the children of the East End of London in the closing decades of the century. By 1900 it had over 4,000 pupils on roll.

Moses Angel continued to stamp his vision on the school for much of this period. By the early 1890s, more than a third of his pupils had been born abroad and, of those born here, the majority were the children of recently arrived immigrants. Many were still struggling with the new language and all the dislocations that their new lives would bring.

Although determined to keep the Jewish faith alive among his pupils, Angel was adamant that they should adopt English culture and customs. In particular, he strongly discouraged the use of Yiddish, which he condemned as unintelligible.

His efforts were successful. According to a Board of Trade Report in 1894,

A far more powerful instrument [than adult evening classes] for 'anglicising' the foreign Jewish community is the great Jews' Free School in Bell Lane, Spitalfields which, in the spring of 1893 was attended by 3,582 Jewish children...They enter the school Russians and Poles and emerge from it almost indistinguishable from English children.

The attempts to eradicate Yiddish was clearly successful. Within two generations, there were few even in the East End who spoke it comfortably. Yiddish theatre continued to serve as a sentimental reminder of a lost culture, but gradually became a minority taste.

With the outbreak of the First World War and the Aliens Acts of 1919-20, Eastern European immigration came to a virtual halt. As the East End Jewish community began its move to the suburbs in the interwar years, the JFS was looking increasingly isolated. The Jewish population of the East End had dropped by a third by the 1920s, and the London County Council considered closing the school.

JFS came into its own again, however, in the 1930s, when it was able to open its doors to refugees from Nazi Germany. On the outbreak of war in 1939, the school and its pupils were evacuated to Ely, in Cambridgeshire (where James de Rothschild was the local MP). A bomb that destroyed the Bell Lane premises in 1941 vindicated the evacuation, but the future of the school hung in the balance once the war was over.

After much wrangling in the period of post-war reconstruction, the school was finally re-opened in new premises in Camden Town in 1958. There it continued to play its part in mainstream educational developments - the introduction of comprehensive schools in the 1960s, then the National Curriculum in the 1980s and grant-maintained status in the 1990s. In 2003, with finance under the Public-Private Partnerships initiative, it moved to new premises in Brent, Middlesex, England.

Throughout its history, the school has striven to offer the highest educational standards to pupils from less privileged backgrounds, turning out a succession of eminent ex-pupils. Among the most notable was Israel Zangwill, who maintained a close connection with the school throughout his life.

Other former pupils include David Woolf Marks, the first Reform Reverend in Britain and professor of Hebrew Literature at University College, London in the mid-19th century; the eminent academic and Zionist Selig Brodetsky; the artist Mark Gertler; bandleader Joe Loss; Bud Flanagan of the inter-war comic duo Flanagan and Allan; British actor David Kossoff; the television personality Alfred Marks; and English MP and government minister Barbara Roche.

They, and countless other former pupils, have recognised the role the school had in transforming their lives.

At the end of the nineteenth century the school roll peaked at 4,250; between 1880 and 1890 one third of all Anglo-Jewish children were educated there. The school is now called the J.F.S. Comprehensive.

3. School registers

There are approximately 20,000 names detailed in the admission and discharge registers of the Jews' Free School, Bell Lane, Stepney, London E1, England.

Several hundred entries have been selected for the Sassienie Worldwide Family Website that has a more significant value for our relatives who attended the school between 1867 - 1887

The register entries below is for anyone with a relative who attended the school between 1860–1888, including individuals listed in the Sassienie family tree. The Jew's Free School, now known as the JFS Comprehensive, is the largest Jewish school in the UK, and one third of all London's Jewish children passed through its doors.

Please note, as common through our family history, officials have mis-spelt the surname Sasieni. Some Sasieni family individuals are quoted in the entries as: Sasina, Sassina & Sassini.

Other misquotes: Pennamacoen, correct spelling of surname: Pennamacoer.
